Subject contents	The subject includes a historical review of the formation and development of criminal police from the end of the 19th century to the present day. The course analyzes the organizational foundations, tasks and methods of operation of police services dealing with combating common and organized crime in various political and legal systems. Particular emphasis is placed on: the institutional and functional genesis of criminal police in Europe and the USA, the impact of social, political and technological changes on the evolution of police structures, the development of investigative methods and forensic techniques, the formation of specialist units (e.g. FBI, Scotland Yard, BKA, CBSP), police activities during periods of authoritarian and totalitarian regimes, post-war reforms of police services and their adaptation to democratic standards, the importance of human rights and ethical norms in the work of criminal services, the impact of psychological and sociological theories on the understanding of crime and the activities of law enforcement agencies. The content is presented in a comparative and interdisciplinary approach, with reference to contemporary challenges for law enforcement agencies in democratic countries. The subject develops critical thinking skills and understanding the role of historical conditions in shaping public security.
