Subject contents	During the course, students will learn to analyze and produce various forms of written communication, including: minutes and reports (e.g., from meetings, committee sessions, business gatherings), applications and requests (e.g., for changes in traffic organization, implementation of urban infrastructure, changes to class schedules or institutional structures), declarations (e.g., of assets, criminal record status, delegation of duties), regulations and instructions (e.g., for competitions, trips, workshops), contracts (e.g., employment contracts, freelance agreements, rental contracts), reports and summaries, EU documents (e.g., regulations, directives, communications, project proposals). As part of the course exercises, students will improve their skills in: drafting texts in accordance with spelling, punctuation, and stylistic norms, writing argumentative texts, opinions, and analyses, working with and modifying standard document templates, reading and critically interpreting formal documents. The curriculum also includes a reflection on the use of modern writing-support tools, such as AI-based text generators (e.g., ChatGPT). Students will explore the capabilities and limitations of these tools: They will learn how to assess the quality and reliability of AI-generated content. They will be trained in the ethical and legally compliant use of AI. They will understand when AI can be used (e.g., to draft preliminary versions) and when independent linguistic and substantive judgment is necessary (e.g., in legal context analysis, evaluating the implications of specific wording, or adjusting tone to a specific audience or institution). The course develops not only linguistic and stylistic competence but also a sense of responsibility for language use in institutional and public contexts. The ability to produce clear, logical, and effective functional texts remains a key skill regardless of growing automation and the availability of digital tools.
